By Aaron Mackey

Four UA professors held a teach-in on the effects of a possible war with Iraq and expressed their opposition to a U.S. attack in front of an almost full auditorium last night.

The event, entitled, “Teach-in: Motivations and Wisdom on the Pending War with Iraq,” featured four professors presenting views opposing a U.S. military action in Iraq. They were each given 15 minutes to express their individual concerns, followed by an hour-long question and answer session.

Addressing the crowd, associate philosophy professor Thomas Christiano said he fears the adverse effects that a war with Iraq has for the Iraqi people.

“When one wages war against another society... what happens is we visit a veritable cataclysm on the people we attack,” Christiano said. Dr. Thomas Christians, associate professor of philosophy, speaks at a campus forum regarding pending hostilities in Iraq.

Christiano asked the crowd to change its perspective and try to visualize what life would be like if they were living in a country about to be invaded.

History professor Richard Eaton said the U.S. government has wanted to re-invade Iraq as early as 1996. The U.S. hopes to remove Saddam Hussein from power if they were living in a country about to be invaded.

Eaton also believes that the Bush administration has “skillfully exploited the fears of 9/11,” by pushing toward a war with Iraq.

By Jeff Sklar

Admissions proposal to diversify UA campus

By Jeff Sklar

When the University of Michigan entered the national spotlight last year for its policy on the role of race in admissions, UA President Pete Likins said he would stay out of the debate.

Now, shortly after filing a legal brief opposing an alternative to Michigan’s policy, he says he can’t avoid the discussion.

Likins plans to push forward with admissions proposals that will give special consideration to minorities as part of his plan to make the UA more diverse, even as the Supreme Court considers the Michigan case, which could have major implications on the role of race in university admissions.

Diversity has been a centerpiece of Likins’ Focused Excellence plan, and even if the court outlaws the use of race as a factor in university admissions, Likins said he is prepared.

See ADMISSIONS/9

See IRAQ/3

TOURING CAMPUS

Spanish and communications senior Meghan Burke gives a campus tour to the Mergel family yesterday afternoon. Paul, 16 (left), and Jack, 15, came to UA with their mother Beth from Michigan to see what UA has to offer for their college education.

GOP legislators may delay cuts until next year

By Cyndy Cole

PHOENIX — Republican lawmakers will propose cutting “a lot less” from UA and the Arizona Health Sciences Center in the next fiscal year than the $15.8 million they proposed late last month, speaker of the Arizona House of Representatives said yesterday.

Instead, they will cut the remainder after July 1, meaning that GOP lawmakers who control the House and Senate might have downsized their proposal to cut $35.2 million from the UA and AHSC between this year and next.

Students lunch with lawmakers, hoping to impact budget future decisions

By Aaron Mackey

Students lunch with lawmakers, hoping to impact budget future decisions

By Cyndy Cole

PHOENIX — Republican lawmakers will propose cutting “a lot less” from UA and the Arizona Health Sciences Center in the next fiscal year than the $15.8 million they proposed late last month, speaker of the Arizona House of Representatives said yesterday.

Instead, they will cut the remainder after July 1, meaning that GOP lawmakers who control the House and Senate might have downsized their proposal to cut $35.2 million from the UA and AHSC between this year and next.

See ASA/10

Teach-in professors express opposition to war with Iraq

By Aaron Mackey

Four UA professors held a teach-in on the effects of a possible war with Iraq and expressed their opposition to a U.S. attack in front of an almost full auditorium last night.

The event, entitled, “Teach-in: Motivations and Wisdom on the Pending War with Iraq,” featured four professors presenting views opposing a U.S. military action in Iraq. They were each given 15 minutes to express their individual concerns, followed by an hour-long question and answer session.

Addressing the crowd, associate philosophy professor Thomas Christiano said he fears the adverse effects that a war with Iraq has for the Iraqi people.

“When one wages war against another society... what happens is we visit a veritable cataclysm on the people we attack,” Christiano said. Dr. Thomas Christians, associate professor of philosophy, speaks at a campus forum regarding pending hostilities in Iraq.

Christiano asked the crowd to change its perspective and try to visualize what life would be like if they were living in a country about to be invaded.

History professor Richard Eaton said the U.S. government has wanted to re-invade Iraq as early as 1996. The U.S. hopes to remove Saddam Hussein from power if they were living in a country about to be invaded.

Eaton also believes that the Bush administration has “skillfully exploited the fears of 9/11,” by pushing toward a war with Iraq.

By Jeff Sklar

Admissions proposal to diversify UA campus

By Jeff Sklar

When the University of Michigan entered the national spotlight last year for its policy on the role of race in admissions, UA President Pete Likins said he would stay out of the debate.

Now, shortly after filing a legal brief opposing an alternative to Michigan’s policy, he says he can’t avoid the discussion.

Likins plans to push forward with admissions proposals that will give special consideration to minorities as part of his plan to make the UA more diverse, even as the Supreme Court considers the Michigan case, which could have major implications on the role of race in university admissions.

Diversity has been a centerpiece of Likins’ Focused Excellence plan, and even if the court outlaws the use of race as a factor in university admissions, Likins said he is prepared.

See ADMISSIONS/9

See IRAQ/3

TOURING CAMPUS

Spanish and communications senior Meghan Burke gives a campus tour to the Mergel family yesterday afternoon. Paul, 16 (left), and Jack, 15, came to UA with their mother Beth from Michigan to see what UA has to offer for their college education.

GOP legislators may delay cuts until next year

By Cyndy Cole

PHOENIX — Republican lawmakers will propose cutting “a lot less” from UA and the Arizona Health Sciences Center in the next fiscal year than the $15.8 million they proposed late last month, speaker of the Arizona House of Representatives said yesterday.

Instead, they will cut the remainder after July 1, meaning that GOP lawmakers who control the House and Senate might have downsized their proposal to cut $35.2 million from the UA and AHSC between this year and next.

Students lunch with lawmakers, hoping to impact budget future decisions

By Aaron Mackey

Students lunch with lawmakers, hoping to impact budget future decisions

By Cyndy Cole

PHOENIX — Republican lawmakers will propose cutting “a lot less” from UA and the Arizona Health Sciences Center in the next fiscal year than the $15.8 million they proposed late last month, speaker of the Arizona House of Representatives said yesterday.

Instead, they will cut the remainder after July 1, meaning that GOP lawmakers who control the House and Senate might have downsized their proposal to cut $35.2 million from the UA and AHSC between this year and next.