PHOENIX — Arizona’s universities are not as badly off financially as other state agencies — even though they’ve taken a bigger budget cut — Republican members of the Senate Committee on Appropriations argued yesterday.

Total funding for Arizona’s universities has risen in recent years, to about $2.221 billion among the three universities. But the increase is largely due to federal research grants, higher tuition and donations, and does not account for inflation. Furthermore, much of the money from non-state sources can’t be used to pay for things such as faculty salaries or electric bills.

Senate Appropriations Chairman Bob Burns (R-Phoenix) said that it looks as though the total fund to the universities or electric bills.

PHOENIX — Arizona’s universities are not as badly off financially as other state agencies — even though they’ve taken a bigger budget cut — Republican members of the Senate Committee on Appropriations argued yesterday.

Total funding for Arizona’s universities has risen in recent years, to about $2.221 billion among the three universities. But the increase is largely due to federal research grants, higher tuition and donations, and does not account for inflation. Furthermore, much of the money from non-state sources can’t be used to pay for things such as faculty salaries or electric bills.

Senate Appropriations Chairman Bob Burns (R-Phoenix) said that it looks as though the total fund to the universities or electric bills.

PHOENIX — Arizona’s universities are not as badly off financially as other state agencies — even though they’ve taken a bigger budget cut — Republican members of the Senate Committee on Appropriations argued yesterday.

Total funding for Arizona’s universities has risen in recent years, to about $2.221 billion among the three universities. But the increase is largely due to federal research grants, higher tuition and donations, and does not account for inflation. Furthermore, much of the money from non-state sources can’t be used to pay for things such as faculty salaries or electric bills.

Senate Appropriations Chairman Bob Burns (R-Phoenix) said that it looks as though the total fund to the universities or electric bills.

PHOENIX — Arizona’s universities are not as badly off financially as other state agencies — even though they’ve taken a bigger budget cut — Republican members of the Senate Committee on Appropriations argued yesterday.

Total funding for Arizona’s universities has risen in recent years, to about $2.221 billion among the three universities. But the increase is largely due to federal research grants, higher tuition and donations, and does not account for inflation. Furthermore, much of the money from non-state sources can’t be used to pay for things such as faculty salaries or electric bills.

Senate Appropriations Chairman Bob Burns (R-Phoenix) said that it looks as though the total fund to the universities or electric bills.

PHOENIX — Arizona’s universities are not as badly off financially as other state agencies — even though they’ve taken a bigger budget cut — Republican members of the Senate Committee on Appropriations argued yesterday.

Total funding for Arizona’s universities has risen in recent years, to about $2.221 billion among the three universities. But the increase is largely due to federal research grants, higher tuition and donations, and does not account for inflation. Furthermore, much of the money from non-state sources can’t be used to pay for things such as faculty salaries or electric bills.

Senate Appropriations Chairman Bob Burns (R-Phoenix) said that it looks as though the total fund to the universities or electric bills.

PHOENIX — Arizona’s universities are not as badly off financially as other state agencies — even though they’ve taken a bigger budget cut — Republican members of the Senate Committee on Appropriations argued yesterday.

Total funding for Arizona’s universities has risen in recent years, to about $2.221 billion among the three universities. But the increase is largely due to federal research grants, higher tuition and donations, and does not account for inflation. Furthermore, much of the money from non-state sources can’t be used to pay for things such as faculty salaries or electric bills.

Senate Appropriations Chairman Bob Burns (R-Phoenix) said that it looks as though the total fund to the universities or electric bills.

PHOENIX — Arizona’s universities are not as badly off financially as other state agencies — even though they’ve taken a bigger budget cut — Republican members of the Senate Committee on Appropriations argued yesterday.

Total funding for Arizona’s universities has risen in recent years, to about $2.221 billion among the three universities. But the increase is largely due to federal research grants, higher tuition and donations, and does not account for inflation. Furthermore, much of the money from non-state sources can’t be used to pay for things such as faculty salaries or electric bills.

Senate Appropriations Chairman Bob Burns (R-Phoenix) said that it looks as though the total fund to the universities or electric bills.

PHOENIX — Arizona’s universities are not as badly off financially as other state agencies — even though they’ve taken a bigger budget cut — Republican members of the Senate Committee on Appropriations argued yesterday.

Total funding for Arizona’s universities has risen in recent years, to about $2.221 billion among the three universities. But the increase is largely due to federal research grants, higher tuition and donations, and does not account for inflation. Furthermore, much of the money from non-state sources can’t be used to pay for things such as faculty salaries or electric bills.

Senate Appropriations Chairman Bob Burns (R-Phoenix) said that it looks as though the total fund to the universities or electric bills.

PHOENIX — Arizona’s universities are not as badly off financially as other state agencies — even though they’ve taken a bigger budget cut — Republican members of the Senate Committee on Appropriations argued yesterday.

Total funding for Arizona’s universities has risen in recent years, to about $2.221 billion among the three universities. But the increase is largely due to federal research grants, higher tuition and donations, and does not account for inflation. Furthermore, much of the money from non-state sources can’t be used to pay for things such as faculty salaries or electric bills.

Senate Appropriations Chairman Bob Burns (R-Phoenix) said that it looks as though the total fund to the universities or electric bills.