Hepatitis exposure possible from Las Vegas Gaming Expo

Anyone who attended the Global Gaming Expo at the Las Vegas Convention Center from Sept. 13 to 14 should be checked for hepatitis A. Officials believe an infected person worked at a food service booth during the conference was handing out ice cream to attendees, who may have unintentionally spread the virus.

The Arizona Department of Health Services is seeking to notify an estimated 739 Arizona residents who may have come into contact with this individual. Symptoms of exposure to the infection may include fever, fatigue, nausea, vomiting, abdominal discomfort, which may be followed within a few days by jaundice. Those interested in meeting the Greek session tonight at 7 in the Education 425; casual dress is required, and refreshments will be served.

Hepatitis exposure possible from Las Vegas Gaming Expo

Anyone who attended the Global Gaming Expo at the Las Vegas Convention Center from Sept. 13 to 14 should be checked for hepatitis A. Officials believe an infected person worked at a food service booth during the conference was handing out ice cream to attendees, who may have unintentionally spread the virus.

The Arizona Department of Health Services is seeking to notify an estimated 739 Arizona residents who may have come into contact with this individual. Symptoms of exposure to the infection may include fever, fatigue, nausea, vomiting, abdominal discomfort, which may be followed within a few days by jaundice. Those interested in meeting the Greek session tonight at 7 in the Education 425; casual dress is required, and refreshments will be served.

Bells spread kindness in Tucson community

By Anthony D. Ávila
Arizona Daily Wildcat

Student volunteers of Ben’s Bells, a local nonprofit organization created to spread kindness to others, are forming a UA club so more students can take part in its mission.

Patrick Bradley, the president of Ben’s Bells on campus, said he decided to start the club because he wants to make it more visible for students who are insulated from its impact.

“When I tell people (on campus), they don’t know about it,” said Bradley, an architecture junior. “And I can’t figure out why.”

Jeanette Maré-Packard, a deaf studies adjunct instructor, created Ben’s Bells in 2003 in memoriam of her son Ben, who died of a brain tumor when he was almost 3 years old, Maré-Packard said.

After the colorful clay bells are made by hand, organizers and volunteers place them in trees and other niches around the city to be picked up by people who find them. The clay bells are being distributed next month, although they are usually sent out in September and then again in March near the anniversary of Ben’s death, Maré-Packard said.

She hopes those who find them will experience the same kindness that helped her family cope with the pain of losing their son, Maré-Packard said.

Bradley said the mission of the club is to bring bell-making meetings to other campus clubs and organizations so they are not left out.

Bells spread kindness in Tucson community

By Anthony D. Ávila
Arizona Daily Wildcat

Student volunteers of Ben’s Bells, a local nonprofit organization created to spread kindness to others, are forming a UA club so more students can take part in its mission.

Patrick Bradley, the president of Ben’s Bells on campus, said he decided to start the club because he wants to make it more visible for students who are insulated from its impact.

“When I tell people (on campus), they don’t know about it,” said Bradley, an architecture junior. “And I can’t figure out why.”

Jeanette Maré-Packard, a deaf studies adjunct instructor, created Ben’s Bells in 2003 in memoriam of her son Ben, who died of a brain tumor when he was almost 3 years old, Maré-Packard said.

After the colorful clay bells are made by hand, organizers and volunteers place them in trees and other niches around the city to be picked up by people who find them. The clay bells are being distributed next month, although they are usually sent out in September and then again in March near the anniversary of Ben’s death, Maré-Packard said.

She hopes those who find them will experience the same kindness that helped her family cope with the pain of losing their son, Maré-Packard said.

Bradley said the mission of the club is to bring bell-making meetings to other campus clubs and organizations so they are not left out.